IIP Fall School

This program aims to provide students with in-depth insight into the field of international intellectual property (IIP) law. This area of law is essential for international economic relations and for promoting technological development. Lacking intellectual property protection or different protection standards in different countries are a severe obstacle to economic development and international trade and investment. This program is unique, as it links teaching, practical experience, and scientific debate in the field. Students of VIT School of Law, McGeorge School of Law, and Paris-Lodron University Salzburg School of Law will be participating in the fall school.

Conference on International Intellectual Property Law

International intellectual property protection is essential for technological development. In addition to the need to harmonize different national standards, intellectual property law must also ensure that private rights and public interest are both satisfied to facilitate technological and sustainable economic development alike. However, this balance lies on a tightrope, and there is a need to apply and interpret these laws in a way, that all interests are adequately balanced. Against this backdrop, the purpose of the conference is to discuss how the different forms of intellectual property laws address new challenges and balance private rights and public interest. The conference aims to provide a platform for academics, advocates, research scholars, law students, NGO's and policymakers to delve into the issue and solicit their view in this regard.
